30-metre Canaletto unveiled at London Bridge Station

A 30-metre long reproduction of one of Canaletto's most famous River Thames scenes - and an inspiration for the design of the Shard - has been unveiled at the newly transformed entrance to London Bridge Station.

The large-scale reproduction of the painting "The Thames on Lord Mayor's Day" (before 1752) graces a temporary side wall at the new station entrance which was completed this week.

Shard architect Renzo Piano claims to have drawn inspiration from Canaletto's depiction of the City of London's church spires. The original painting will be loaned to the National Maritime Museum in Greenwich this year as part of exhibition to celebrate the Queen's Diamond Jubilee.

The painting, depicting the Lord Mayor's Show river procession as seen from Bankside, is owned by the Lobkowitz Collections in the Czech Republic.

The installation of the large-scale image coincides with the unveiling of the next stage of the transformation of London Bridge Station as the new entrance to the station, designed to integrate with the glass facade of the Shard, is unveiled.

"The London Bridge Quarter development has been a catalyst for the much needed modernisation of the station concourse which we are completing with the minimum of disruption to the travelling public," says Irvine Sellar, chairman of Sellar Property Group.

"Bringing the station into the 21st century not only makes life easier for current passenger traffic but will accommodate the planned expansion when the full Thameslink service becomes operational and as many as 75 million people use London Bridge Station every year.

"We are delighted to be able to display this famous Canaletto painting in such a prominent way and at the same time help celebrate the Queen's Diamond Jubilee."

• The Canaletto painting will be part of the exhibition Royal River: Power, Pageantry and the Thames - curated by David Starkey - which opens on 27 April at the National Maritime Museum.

Olivia Poulet, best known as Tory staffer Emma Messinger in The Thick of It, stars opposite Joseph Drake in the world premiere of Philip Ridley's play. A young couple are moving into their new home. A soldier is being held hostage. Two boys are searching for monsters. All these things are connected by both family and time but what story can be told when family and time are broken? Covering over twelve years, it unpicks the story of two families and then re-weaves it into something new and startling. Seven people, one war, a derelict car plant and mysterious lights in the sky all come together in the Essex new-town of Draylingstowe, where the view from green hills once offered hope and prosperity for all. Directed by Russell Bolam.

LOCAL HISTORY

Bermondsey health propaganda on show

Films made by Bermondsey Borough Council in the 1920s and 1930s to promote public health are at the centre of a new temporary display at the Wellcome Collection in Euston Road.

Here Comes Good Health! is a small exhibition which examines the vision of Alfred and Ada Salter, Bermondsey's MP and Mayor, who inspired an imaginative programme of public health propaganda activities.

From the 1920s onwards the council sought to bring hygiene messages to a community where prevention was the norm and catastrophic but preventable illnesses such as diphtheria were rife.

Under the direction of the Salters and Dr DM Connan, Bermondsey's medical officer of health, the council customised a set of vans to become 'cinemotors', powered by adapted lampposts as a portable means of projecting a series of films extolling the virtues of cleanliness and warning of the dangers of disease.

Four of these films can be seen in the display which takes the form of a replica 'cinemotor'. All four films – Health and Clothing (1928), Some Activities of the Bermondsey Borough Council (1931), Where There's Life There's Soap (1933) and The Empty Bed (1937) – have also been published online by the Wellcome Collection.

"The films made by Bermondsey Borough Council for its populace have alas receded over time into relative obscurity," says Angela Seward, curator at the Wellcome Collection.

"This new display gives visitors the opportunity to appreciate some of these films in a sympathetic context. The films together with other health propaganda materials on view here were highly influential in shaping health policy at the time as well as well-loved by the citizens of the borough.

"Many of the principles of healthy living are now more or less universal and we are fortunate to live in an age where many of the privations outlined in the films are a distant memory."

Crowds of up to 1,000 gathered for screenings which, despite the silent inter-titled films, were noisy affairs, with children singing along to the captions and audience participation encouraged by speakers who introduced each film.

Bermondsey council's public health messages were integrated into the civic life of the borough: floats at the May Day Parade included medical and dental demonstrations; public spaces, including churchyards, were co-opted as parks and playgrounds; and garden tuberculosis shelters, allowing sufferers to sleep in the fresh air, were provided free of charge.

The ambitious vision of the department of public health in Bermondsey can be seen in the original plans for their Grange Road Health Centre which outlined a grand architectural beacon of modernism. As with the Salters' hope that Bermondsey would be rebuilt as a garden suburb (some 5,000 trees were planted between 1919 and 1926) the reality was somewhat scaled down. But the purpose built solarium it contained was the first in the country and soon replicated in other London boroughs.

- Here Comes Good Health! is at the Wellcome Collection until 3 June; daily except Monday; free. All exhibition materials are also available online.
