All change at Southbank Centre Festival Wing plans to be revealed

Southbank Centre will this month reveal proposals for the refurbishment of the Queen Elizabeth Hall, Purcell Room and Hayward Gallery complex – to be known as the Festival Wing – with a public exhibition from Thursday 7 March.

Plans are currently being drawn up by Feilden Clegg Bradley Studios who were appointed as lead architect last autumn. Their design brief is to refurbish and renew the 1960s concert halls and art gallery, as well as explore a more ambitious project to reclaim unused and underused space.

Early documents lodged with Lambeth Council reveal that an 'infill extension' is proposed between the Hayward Gallery and the Queen Elizabeth Hall rising to nearly 45 metres, the same height as City Hall.

A 31-metre-high 'linear building' could sit between Waterloo Bridge and the Queen Elizabeth Hall.

The plans are likely to see venue and gallery space almost trebled to 9,000 sq m, with foyer space doubling to 3,000 sq m.

One of the most controversial elements of the new scheme is the 5,500 sq m allocated to restaurants and cafes.

Artistic director Jude Kelly said: "Our vision is to make the most of these extraordinary buildings and the spaces around them so that we can provide more art for more people of all ages and create world-class facilities for artists and visitors to enjoy, fit for the 21st century. We will draw on the continued success of our year-round festival programme and the original spirit of the Festival of Britain to transform this part of the site."

At a panel discussion in January Clare Hughes, creative producer at Feilden Clegg Bradley, explained the changing requirements of the arts centre.

"At Southbank Centre they've made an amazing job working with difficult buildings which were designed at a time when their artistic and cultural programme was structured around discrete, almost bunker-like, places for specific types of art," she said.

"Now the art is much more free-flowing and public space and free events are far more important than anyone could have imagined in the 1960s.

"With these buildings, their strengths are their weakness. I would say that their difficulty was part of their rationale: they were the rebellious teenager alongside the upper middle class parents at the Festival Hall."

She added: "Like most teenagers, they do have to start to grow up now. I think it's that growing process that we are trying to help with."

The draft designs for the new Festival Wing will be presented at a public exhibition open from Thursday 7 March in the Royal Festival Hall at Level 2 Blue Side. The exhibition will be open daily 10am-11pm and will be updated as the plans develop through consultation. • www.southbankcentre.co.uk/festivalwing

The Shard is one of 90 contenders for the Design of the Year title which will feature in a new exhibition at the Design Museum from Wednesday 20 March. A Room for London, the temporary hotel room on top of the Queen Elizabeth Hall, has also been nominated. See listing on page 7.
